

Don Randall

Don Randall served with the City of London Police from 1969 to 1995, with specialisations in investigations with specific emphasis on fraud and counter terrorism. He left the police service at the rank of Superintendent where he spent four years as Deputy Head of the Fraud Squad and three years in the Operational Support Department.

He was the senior ground commander during the 'Bishopsgate Bomb' and was integral in the formulisation of many of the counter terrorist measures employed by the City of London and, in particular, what is known as the 'Ring of Steel'.

Don was Managing Director at JP Morgan Chase, which he joined in 1995, and held the post of International Security Manager and had responsibilities for corporate security, fire life safety, technical and card access, investigations, health and safety, pre-employment screening, due dilligence and all other security-related issues for Europe, Middle East and Africa and the Asia pacific regions.

In August 2008, Don assumed the role of Head of Security at the Bank of England. Don is chairman of the 'Sister Banks', the City of London Crime Prevention Association and 'Project Griffin' (a joint partnership between the private and public sector security industries), a member of the City of London Crime and Disorder Reduction Panel; the London Resilience Business Forum and Implementation Group, and sits on various expert panels relating to the prevention, deterrent and detection of terrorist and other criminal activities.

Don Randall is also an external lay member of the City of London Police Committee. He is the Vice Chairman of the Child Victims of Crime charity and a trustee of two other law enforcement/ public related charities. Don was awarded the MBE in 2007 for services to law enforcement involving the harmonisation of the public and private sector agencies.
